I had read a book recently called "A Billion Wicked Thoughts" which examines pornography and women's romance novels to try to understand what men and women want. There were sections of the book that made me think, "Are the authors fans of the Red Pill sub?" but other parts of the book went against Red Pill concepts. Thought you might all find it interesting. Here's some excerpts. We reject the psychology's notion that brains and memory are inherently subjective and selective, in that we tend to look for evidence to confirm what we already believe. Instead the fact that we constantly get reliable and verifiable anecdotes and testimonials that confirm our hypotheses proves that traditional science has outlived its usefulness. The Book on Sex 'Want to know what really turns your partner on?' A Billion Wicked Thoughts offers the clearest picture ever of the differences between male and female sexuality and the teeming diversity of human desire. What makes men attracted to images and so predictable in their appetites? What makes the set up to a romantic evening so important for a woman? Why are women's desires so hard to predict? Neuroscientists Ogi Ogas and Sai Gaddam reveal the mechanics of sexual relationships based on their extensive research into the mountains of new data on human behavior. We of the tender gender don't crave those hunky-funky close-ups. Our sexual brain circuitry is built to handle exquisitely delicate, elaborate physical and psychological arousal cues — emotional, social and intuitive as well as sexual — almost all essentially directed at snagging a worthy daddy. The Democratic pol who tweets a pic of his bulgy drawers? After one reads "A Billion Wicked Thoughts," several oddities linger in the reluctant mind. There is the case of a successful businessman with three children, who, a couple of times a week, drives to a strange neighborhood, parks near a house with its lights on but no car in the driveway, creeps into a stranger's coat closet and pleasures himself, with the risk of discovery by a housewife or returning mate heightening his excitement. "A Billion Wicked Thoughts" promises to reveal "the truth about what men and women secretly desire" and why. Ogas and Gaddam, cognitive neuroscientists who met as graduate students at Boston University, analyzed a year's worth of terms entered into the search engine aggregator Dogpile between July 2009 and July 2010, and found that 55 million of the roughly 400 million terms were sexual in nature. Straight women were physically aroused by everything, including the bonobos, but their self-reports often contradicted what the sensors measured. Chivers's study shed light on the failure to produce a "female Viagra": while increased blood flow to the penis is sufficient to incite a man to sexual desire, increased blood flow alone will not produce feminine desire.
