Galene lay beneath a column of kelp, one of many that dotted the forest he called home. The leaves on his back swayed, unreflective of the solemn state of his mind. There was no dancing otters or screeching gulls, as he sat alone thinking, trying to place the odd foreboding. Endless sheets of scattered light and scattered vision. Droning ever on with no indication of stopping in the next lifetime. Prickle tucked himself closer to the back of his soggy, dripping box. The world's tropical rainforests comprise some 6% of the Earth's land area and contain more than half of all known life forms, or a conservative estimate of about 30 million species of plants and animals. Some experts estimate there could be two or even three times as many species hidden within these complex and fast- disappearing ecosystems, scientists will probably never know for certain, so vast is the amount of study required. 2. Time is running out for biological research. Commercial development is responsible for the loss of about 17 million hectares of v
