Although research findings about development processes agree that there are no Those in social science research " producers, funders or (potential) users " are increasingly aware of the limitations of simple models (descriptive or prescriptive) of research use and research impact. Further, the diversity of social science research, and the complexity of the means by which research findings may come into use, make understanding and assessing non-academic research impacts a challenging task. Their expectation was that this approach " will produce its own narrative or story of what caused utilisation in the particular context" , but they also highlight the need to " structure all such studies around a conceptual framework" . Section 4 examines how social innovation research projects deal with collective action. It identifies a general shift " from talking to doing" , with considerably more focus on the social and economic output of SI than on the prior decision making process, an important component of democratic functioning. Yet in most of the reviewed projects, as Section 3 explains, stakeholders were actively included, e.g. in capacity building projects for the training of social entrepreneurs, active engagement in research projects, or the promotion and facilitation of networking efforts. Finally, the paper seeks to give a close perspective on the potential of SI research and practice for the transformation of existent socio-political systems. Crowdsourcing business model innovation using social media platforms. 2013 / Baker D. Customer orientation of B2B firms in emerging markets: evidence from Russia. The "open innovation" model (were created in 2003) developed as a response to changes in the attitude of large businesses to research and development, due to increasing competition. Earlier innovations were created in-house, i.e. by internal divisions of companies, but now markets feel the pressure to increase the speed of introducing new products into the market. In social services, expert knowledge began to play a crucial role in the evaluation of and increase in quality and the effectiveness and efficiency of performance (Weimer and Vining 1992: 12). As the experiences of the UK and other countries in the West demonstrate, New Public Management increased the privileges of professional autonomy, the more accountable social worker targeting scarce resources in the most efficient and effective way. Also, it tried to increase service users' alternatives and raise the standards of social workers' qualifications and practice (Dominelli 2004: 14-15); it promoted the t
