While fishing is geographically extensive on the high seas, it is perhaps less so than previously assumed. Using a spatial grid with 0.5° resolution, we estimate that fishing occurred in 132 million km² or 57% of the high seas in 2016; this number reduces to 48% with a grid of 0.25° resolution. Fishing effort in the high seas occurs mostly between latitudes 45°N and 35°S (Fig. 1). Sixty-four percent of all national bottom trawling operations in FAO regions were unprofitable without subsidies, and a remarkable 32% of these operations appear to have been unprofitable even with subsidies, which raises obvious questions about the incentives to fish there. Indonesia, the only flag state that publicly provides VMS data, fished only in the high seas of the Indian Ocean. Records of the fishes from the northern Mid-Atlantic Ridge (MAR) (41°N - 60°N) sampled during two research cruises conducted in summer 2004 on the R/V G.O. Sars and M/S Loran are presented. The cruises were major sampling efforts carried out for the MAR-ECO project, i.e. the Census of Marine Life field project entitled "Patterns and Processes of the Ecosystems of the Northern Mid-Atlantic". The investigation included sampling with several midwater nets, bottom trawl and longlines from surface waters to about 4000 m. The list comprises around 300 species of fishes from 82 families.

Yesterday, on July 20, a car accident HAPPENED in the Main Street. Josh Peters, the witness, WAS STANDING on the corner and WAITING for the green light. He says he SAW a big red car which WAS DRIVING very fast. The driver probably WANTED to get through the yellow light. Meanwhile, a green van on the other street BEGAN to move forward. The driver of the red car WASN'T ABLE to stop in time. The two cars SMASHED. There WERE a lot of damage to both cars. The witness WAS CALLING an ambulance at once when he SAW that one of the driver WAS BLEEDING. The other driver WAS NOT HURT.
