Learning about fly-fishing can be confusing. For example, some people will encourage you to get a fly line to match the rod you are buying. Others will tell you that you could go one or two lines heavier or lighter (this is true but the explanation here would make this a very long page). Fly-fishing uses a long flexible pole and heavy fishing line to propel fishing flies to trout. Fly fishing is a method that is equally at home in creeks, rivers or lakes. The gear is a little more expensive and the learning curve a bit higher than conventional spin fishing. Though the rewards that many people get from fly fishing are worth all of the extra work. Fishing flies are made in all shapes, sizes, and colors into what are referred to as different "fly patterns" to imitate anything from a swimming mouse down to a mosquito larvae. However, there are methods to use fishing flies with out a fly fishing rod. By using what is known as a "casting bubble" some flies, particularly streamers, can be used with a spinning rod setup.
