Some historians appear to practice history professionally, in the sense that they produce histories that are accepted by other historians as "real" and "full." In this sense there is a profession of sorts, and exclusive body of persons who determine who may enter into appropriate practice. How can the difference between the amateur and the professional be detected when professionals also publish in HarperCollins (for example). What are the criteria of professionalism in history and which are fundamental? historiography. View Professional History Research Papers on Academia.edu for free.
