Resources: The Writer's Harbrace Handbook, 3rd edition and The LB Brief Handbook, 5th edition Many people have difficulty deciding on the proper usage of who and its counterpart, whoever, and whom and its counterpart, whomever. Which is correct? Who and whoever are generally subjective pronouns, meaning they are the subject of the sentence: Who (whoever) is used as the subject of a verb whether in an independent or a dependent clause. It is also used as the predicate noun after the linking verb (form of to be). He is the one who wrote the book. The winner will be whoever runs the fastest. (The Writer's Harbrace Handbook itself is edited according to The. Preface. . they become better prepared and more successful as writers.
