LONDON — The Australian airline Qantas is preparing for what could become the world's longest direct commercial flights — around 19 hours nonstop to Sydney from New York and London — with three test runs to monitor the effects of so-called ultra-long-haul journeys on the body. Some 40 people including pilots, crew members and passengers will become onboard guinea pigs for two test flights from New York to Sydney and one from London to Sydney, the airline said on Thursday. Teams of scientists and medical experts will be closely observing the physical and mental impact of the lengthy journey spent in the confines of an airplane cabin. A Virgin Atlantic flight from Los Angeles to London peaked at a whopping 801 mph Monday evening 35,000 feet over Pennsylvania. Tuesday is a nice day across the Northeast. Temperatures near 40 in New York, light winds out of the north at 5 mph to 10 mph, and wall-to-wall sunshine sound like a tranquil day — especially by February standards. But high up in the atmosphere, it's a different story. Support our journalism. Subscribe today. The jet stream, the high-altitude air current along which storms travel, is furious. The river of air was clocked at more than 230 mph over Long Island on Monday. That measure comes from the 250 millibar pressure level, meaning it was at a height above 75 percent of the atmosphere's mass.
